

PHILIP QUARLE.

The next morning being wakened by an uncommon noise, he got up, and went to the place where he heard the noise from. Being come to the place, he found it proceeded from a number of monkeys, who were at that time in great tumult, squalling and fighting against one another for a considerable quantity of wild figs, which the wind had shook down in the night.

His coming having caused a tumult among one of those creatures keeping still, during his stay, he resolves to use his endeavours to make a solid peace. He divides the fruit into two parcels, and the monkeys came quietly to that share, and carried it away to their quarters.

He then took a walk to see how the corn and beans come on, which he found to the improving disposition, each stem bearing a number of well-filled pods. In his leisure time, he takes a resolution to draw a map of the island, which, after some time and trouble, he finished.

Taking his walks to visit his nest, he had set for eagles he found a turkey; and having had none for above a week, he dresses it, and eats thereof for his dinner. Though he was not pleased with the bird he had taken,
